				With the rapid development of social networking websites, adolescents have more channels to receive information. Groups in cyberspace not only provide platforms for adolescents to express their feelings but also help them find friends with common interests. Adolescents can know more about social issues and participate in relevant activities through online groups. For example, the 'post-80s' generation in the anti-high speed rail movement from 2009 to 2010, Scholarism's anti-national education movement in 2012, the controversy over the North East New Territories new developments and the 'Save Lung Mei Beach' campaign in 2013 all proved the ability of political mobilisation on the Internet and through social media. Groups in cyberspace not only provide platforms for adolescents to express their feelings but also help them find friends with common interests. Adolescents can know more about social and livelihood issues and participate in relevant activities through online groups. For example, an environmental organisation called for an 'oil slick clean-up action in Lamma Island's beach' online, that gathered volunteers to clean up oil in beaches on Lamma Island. Over 100 netizens participated in this event. Besides, animal volunteers had made an online call for assistance on social media, requested netizens to come to an animal shelter to rescue animals which were threatened by a hill fire. Eventually 300 netizens came
